Telephone Hotline
Now Established

The National Committee for Citizens in Education announced today a nationwide program to help parents reassert their rights in the control of public education.

Beginning Monday (October 7), parents in the continental United States can dial a toll-free number--800-NET-WORK--to hear a message highlighting NCC's current citizen-action programs. By leaving their name and address, parents will be sent more detailed information by return mail.

First focus of the hotline service will be to help citizens monitor a new Federal law which protects the rights of privacy of school children and parents.

The new law, called the Family Education Rights and Privacy Act of 1974, states that parents of students in any educational institution receiving Federal funds---whether day-care centers, or elementary and secondary schools or universities---must be allowed to examine their child's full record and must have the opportunity to challenge and correct wrong or misleading information. Further, school administrators are forbidden to show a student's record to an outside party without parental consent. The same rights are extended to students who are 18 or older. The penalty for non-compliance is withholding of Federal education funds.

The Act, which was signed by President Ford on August 21, becomes effective on November 20.

Cards returned to NCCE will be used as the basis of a report to the appropriate Congressional committees on how well the law is being observed.

"Unfortunately, the typical student record is a grab-bag filled with test scores, medical and psychological reports, comments on behavior, and so forth. Often this information, such as remarks on parents' private lives or political activities, is quite irrelevant to the purpose of education.
