'Parlifunkadelicment Thang Invasion'

America has launched Parliament as top purveyors of a kind of soul music that picks up where Sly & The Family Stone left off. The raves continued when they toured England recently, even after controversy reached staggering proportions. The 11 member group was formerly banned from Royal Albert Hall and the Lyceum Ballroom for creating a mood of excitement that bordered on riot conditions. The prestigious British music publication Melody Maker said "They turned the marrow-bone to jelly and nourished the soul."

Parliament is actually two groups, the Parliament and Funkadelic Thang. Parliament and Funkadelic record together for two separate labels, and they tour the country together as the Parlifunkadelicment Thang Invasion. And invade they do...like the first encounter with rock & roll. They materialize on stage dressed as clowns, magicians, African kings, and Zulu warriors. The bizarre costumes are endless and interchangeable. During their performance, a religious fever overtakes the room, and audiences join in the singing and dancing.

After a very successful premiere effort for the record, label Casablanca, entitled "Up For the Down Stroke," containing the top five singles of the same name, the group has released a second lp "Chocolate City," (a surname for Washington, D.C.) which already has sold in excess of 200,000 copies, and has prompted the group to embark on a national tour. Parliament brings a city -- a "Chocolate City" -- for all to take residence in.
