DELINQUENCY

Can a child's predisposition to delinquency be predicted?

Will school teachers of the future be able to prevent young people from becoming law-breakers by watching for early signs of delinquency in the classroom?

That's the aim of an innovative program beginning this fall at the University of Nevada, which will be examining the phenomenon of delinquency - how it can be detected and prevented before it ruins a young life.

Dr. Russ Andaloro, coordinator of UNLV's new juvenile delinquency program, is now screening applicants for an in-service field program which will compile a comprehensive study of delinquents already in the custody of the juvenile court system.

"The object of the program," says Andaloro, "is to help the students to recognize the emotional characteristics and environmental situations that could lead to juvenile delinquency and learn how to deal with them in the classroom."

"It will be difficult to see the results of such a program immediately," he says. "It may take a few years before we can effectively evaluate the success of the experiment."
