BUNNY WAILER

The least known, outside Jamaica, of the original Wailer trio, "Bunny Wailer" was christened Neville O'Riley Livingston. He was born on April 10, 1947 in Kingston, and he grew up with Bob Marley under the same roof in Trenchtown.

Trenchtown, Kingston's most infamous district, became equally renowned for its ghetto poverty, its juvenile delinquency and general rowdiness, and its music. Its squalor bred musical creativity. From sound systems like "Sir Coxon" to singers like the Wailers. When Jamaicans say "all the best singers come from Trenchtown," they're speaking as much out of pride in the area as out of conviction. They mean that you might have been good before you came to Trenchtown but now you're a whole lot better.

Trenchtown's reputation in music owes much to the Studio One recording setup operated in the vicinity by sound system man Sir Coxson. Studio One was a roots man studio. It was there that the original Wailers went to make their recording debut.

Of the three original Wailers only Bunny, known to his brethren as "Jah B." was actually born in Trenchtown. Jah B, of the tribe of Reuben, is one of the most undaunting, outspoken and intelligent of Rastas to be found making so-called reggae music. His gift is his voice; his penchant is for perfection. That he is the least know Wailer is due to his strong, stubborn character.

Bunny has sung on Peter Tosh's recordings and co-written songs with him. He has no plans to tour outside of Jamaica. Bunny Wailer's work has shown a degree of sophistication and dignity lacking in that of the other Wailers. At the same time his music has never strayed from the path of righteousness.
