Many people, black as well as white, read for instance, that a far larger percentage of blacks are poor in this country than whites (the evidence is there to see, as well). In 1975, 27.1 per cent of black families had incomes that fell below the poverty line compared to only 7.7 per cent of white families. If you're black, no doubt about it, your chances of being poor are far greater in this country.

However, the total number of poor white families in 1975 was far greater (3.8 million) than that of poor black families (1.5 million), Ms. Porter points out. In July, 1975, 4.4 million households participated in the food stamps program - 62 per cent white holds and only 36 per cent black.

White families outnumber blacks as recipients of Aid To Families with Dependent Children, as families received this assistance - 1.7 million whites; 1.5 million black.

In other family type transfer income: unemployment compensation, government employee pensions, veterans benefits - more whites than blacks were recipients. In 1974, almost 10 million white families received payments of this type. Ms Porter reveals, against fewer than one million blacks. Black family income was $1,721 as against $2,114 white family income gained from these forms of income maintenance benefits.

Welfare reform debates will be, as she correctly points out, 'bitter and prolonged' on Capitol Hill and across the country. But the debates won't be helped by continuing the phony myth that blacks are the principal recipients of the weighty welfare burden shouldered by a disgruntled middle-class taxpayer.
