KIDDING AROUND An animal lover, Tammy Patterson, March of Dimes National Poster Child, has her hands full with this little billygoat. Both little dea + Tammy and Delilah the Fawn became fast friends.

Although she was born with multiple birth defects, March of Dimes National Poster Child Tammy Patterson of Mt. Pleasant, Tenn., leads an active life. The bouncy, giggly, six-year-old pixie loves to tell riddles, ride her bicycle, do puzzles, color, and help her mother with the gardening. Tammy and her family live on a 12-acre farm outside of Columbia, Tenn., where they have pigs, cows, ducks, and rabbits. Now in first grade at May Long Grammar School, Tammy wants to become a nurse when she grows up. As National Poster Child, she represents more than 200,000 American youngsters born each year with physical or mental handicaps.

NO ONE CAN BURST THEIR BUBBLES Balloon blowing can be loads of fun for chimps as well as children, as Tammy Patterson, March of Dimes National Poster Child and her friend Bo, proudly point out.

R for your child's safety

Many of the thousands of tragic accidents suffered each year by children could be averted by clear, demonstrative parental warnings, says Dr. Albert H. Domm, child safety specialist and former medical director of the Prudential Insurance Company.

"It is very important," Dr. Domm asserts, "that in teaching youngsters proper safety habits, the parents associate the danger with the warning or admonishment." All too often this is not the case.

As an example, he points out the hypothetical case of the tot who was told by his mother that he would be spanked if he went into the street. Thus, the next time the tot crossed the street, instead of looking for traffic, he glanced back over his shoulder to see if his mother was watching and was struck by a car.

"You see," says Dr. Domm, "the child was fearful only of a spanking and was not aware of the real danger — the automobile."
