SWATTING AT INFLATION

You may blame inflation on those two-legged creatures in Washington, but you can also blame the six-legged variety called insects. By devouring crops, insects increase food costs and eat into our budgets.

Competing for our food are more than 10,000 kinds of destructive insects, such as beetles, flies, grubs, weevils and hoppers. Other pests including rats and some 1,800 varieties of weeds also attack crops.

By controlling these thousands of pests, chemical pesticides help keep food prices down. According to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, without pesticides crop production would drop 30 percent, livestock production would go down 25 percent, and food prices would jump as much as 75 percent.

Pesticide-producing companies like Monsanto Company spend up to 10 years and $10 million developing each weed or other pest killer and testing it for safety. The use of those products means the bite put on our wallets in the supermarket will have less of a sting
