More recently, the general trend has helped up, although Great Britain and France have watched their unemployment rates rise nearly to American levels, while the Canadian rate exceeded the U.S. rate for quite some time. Germany, Sweden, and Japan, however, have kept unemployment low, with none of them exceeding the 4 percent mark at any time during the 1970's.

What explains the success of the Japanese and Europeans in keeping unemployment low? For one thing, people — and here I include policymakers, and businessmen — simply refuse to accept the antiquated notion that high unemployment is a morally acceptable instrument of economic policy. In the United States, however, many economists, and even quite a few politicians, view planned unemployment as one of the most effective methods of controlling inflation, and for restoring "balance" to the economy. But such an approach is anathema in other industrialized countries.

Second, the Japanese and Europeans reject the archaic dogmatism that plagues economic policy-makers in the United States.

If we hope ever to achieve full employment in America, we need to convince ourselves that our goal is realistic, not just a utopian dream
