Women Can Get The Credit They Deserve

Historically, women have had a harder time obtaining credit than have men. That stemmed from the mistaken belief that women were bad credit risks. The facts clearly refute this myth. Over the years many women have done an excellent job of managing their finances and credit.

In extending credit, Federal laws make it illegal to discriminate based on sex or marital status. Women can obtain credit in their own names. Single women cannot lose their credit rating if they marry and married women cannot lose theirs if they are widowed or divorced.

Many financial advisors recommend that women establish their own independent financial identities in a credit history. While many credit histories are listed in the husband's name, a woman may request that creditors consider any account that accurately reflects her creditworthiness.

General Motors Acceptance Corporation (GMAC), the consumer financing arm of General Motors Corporation, has helped women finance vehicles since the company was founded over 61 years ago. GMAC is offering a free booklet "Women Can Get The Credit They Deserve." It's available from GMAC, Department NA, 767 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10153.

BankAmerica Corporation was the first company that MD&Co. approached. One of the firm's partners contacted Barbara Muselli, Bank of America's Minority Purchasing Officer, who is also a member of the Bay Area Purchasing Council. She arranged a meeting with the bank's chief auditor, Cameron Jarrett.

"Because of our size, we recognized that we will never be the principal auditors for BankAmerica or General Motors," said Morris, "but, everyone of those organizations has a number of smaller jobs that we can do very effectively."

Morris said that minority-owned businesses make up almost four percent of all the businesses in the nation, yet they contribute less than one percent of the revenues. And, since the large corporations control the purse strings -- and at times they do not appear to be too anxious to open -- it's difficult not to let that feeling creep up," he said.

The positive reaction they received from both BankAmerica and Ernst & Whinney was not quite what they expected. "We were kind of surprised, but quite pleased," said Morris "They were extremely receptive."

"The arrangement that we've made with Morris, Davis & Company is not a 'carrot' nor a form of tokenism," said Jarrett. "Their policies, procedures and organization exhibited professionalism that is first class."

Jarrett feels that big business should take a leadership role in helping minority businesses grow. "It's not only a matter of corporate responsibility," he said, "it's good business."

NEWS OF ENERGY

Oil and natural gas fuel most American homes, industry and transportation -- and probably will for the rest of this century.

Although many alternative energy sources look promising, practical reality demands that we keep finding oil and natural gas until other sources are developed.

Oil and natural gas: Seek and ye shall find!

Fortunately we are finding them. For one thing, we are drilling deeper than ever before: a well recently dug in Texas went down to a depth of 5.5 miles.

Some companies have modified their refineries. Gulf Oil, for instance, invested over $500 million so its refineries can handle heavier grades of crude oil in order to maintain its supplies of gasoline, home heating fuel and lubricating oils -- and to protect the environment.

New technologies in recovery will allow us to get new production from oil fields that a decade ago would have been abandoned.

There is some light in America's energy picture!
