harder," the schools "aren't, I think, that concerned" about social issues.

Another thing that concerns Greene is a feeling that athletics can serve as a "way out" for all black youngsters who have ability in sports.

"That (attitude) is a big problem," he said. "Remember, a pro football team only has 45 players and while it's great to be an athlete, you must remember that your athletic days only last a few short years."

While athletics can offer the fortunate few "quick money and things like that," youngsters must realize that they need to be "versatile in his or her life."

"The way to do that," he went on, "is, I feel, for a person to go to college even if they don't graduate. They're still much better off for it."

Greene expressed concern for the conservative turn that is apparent in American politics as well.

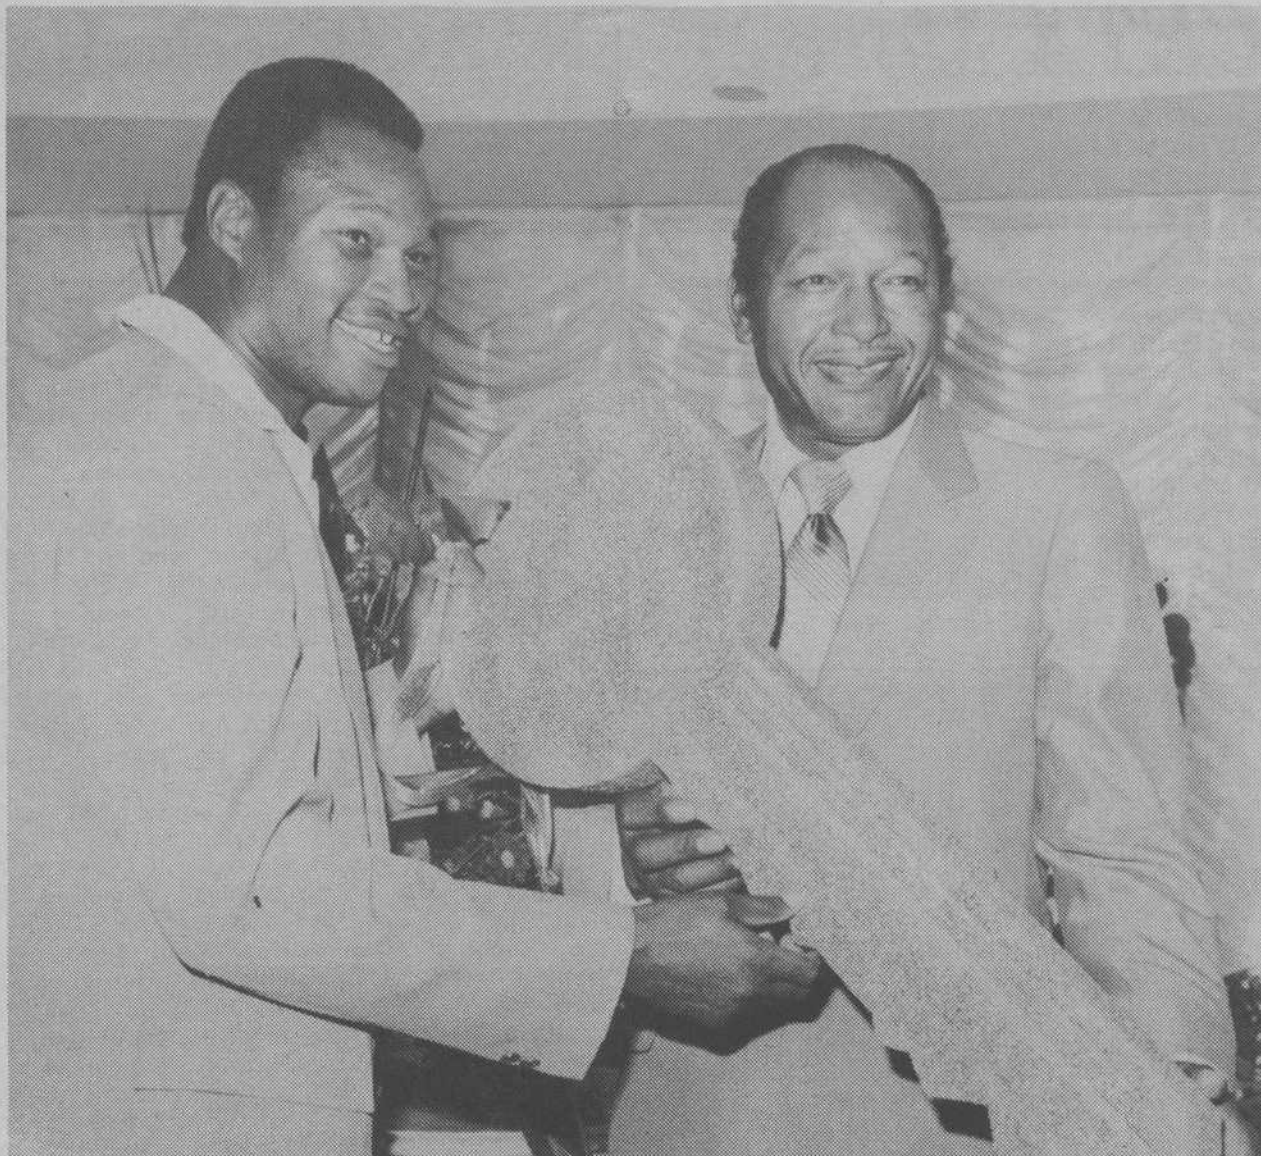

"I was into the Kennedys," he said, "and I feel that Reagan is far to conservative. He's said he's not talking to too many people until he's elected — and that turns me off."

That's why, he feels, it is important to register and vote — not just talk about change.

"There are a lot of people who raise hell with their talk," he said, "but when it comes down to registering and voting, they want someone else to do it for them. But it just doesn't work that way."

"The conservatives don't raise that much hell but they do get out and vote."

So in the long run, if more meaningful changes are going to be made in this country, it will be people like the Sam Greenes who use their athletic ability to gain a "name" and use that recognition to go out and "play" in a much bigger "ball game" for the rest of his life.
