

 Crowding. "Schools which had major disruptions in the late '60s and early '70s often had many more students than they were designed to serve."
The shift from local schools to huge emporia of education. "Large schools have a higher incidence of and more serious crime and disruption than smaller schools. School spirit is difficult if not impossible to develop in large, urban secondary schools which have 4,000 to 5,000 students."

* Victims of attack and robbery in high schools "are more likely than nonvictims to be offenders themselves."

* Suspension of offending students rarely makes a difference. ''Staff members often comptain about the unavailability of adequate counseling or psychiatric help.''

* School crime and violence are low where principals are dynamic, and where students have access to and can identify with teachers.

Could it be that when we abandoned "the little red schoolhouse'' and leaped through "con-solidation" to huge schools enrolling thousands, we gave up more than we got? In the old-style smaller school there was no place for troublemakers to hide, because the principal knew usually each student -- and his or her family. Some of today's schools are so large that not only do principals and teachers not know all their students, but they cannot distinguish students from outsiders who peddle dope, steal lunches and purses, foment violence and otherwise create a climate of fear.

There surely is no single or simple panacea for the problem of violence in the schools. But we ought to explore seriously the question of whether we can reverse the trend and limit enrollment in our schools to a level where there can be some meaningful relationship between teachers and students.
