80th birthday last Sunday. "One thing, I'd like to see our players have more enthusiasm. They delay the game putting on those batting gloves when they should already be at the plate ready to hit.

"And now," he continued, "they have batting gloves. I didn't have the money to buy gloves for the winter much less for sliding. They have the wrong attitude — it is a bad thing — and maybe someone will tell 'em."

"I don't feel bitter about nothin'," said Hal Dandridge, bandy-legged ed former third baseman who never played in the majors. "They said a train could go through my legs but a baseball couldn't. We played anywhere they would let us play. If I had hit the major leagues for one day, I'd have said I had made it."

Irvin was by-passed by Branch Rickey, general manager of the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1947, in favor of Robinson because he had become ill during service in Europe in World War II. Irvin subsequently played eight years in the majors.
