

CARDS

and adventurous as the drunkard who tries to chisel the price of a drink.

In cards there are about the same proportion of honest and dishonest people as there are in any other field. The ratio varies a little from game to game, from state to state, just as it varies in legitimate enterprise. You encounter more sharp practice in war contracts, say, then you do in the personnel office of a theological seminary.

Likewise, you find that a game which tends to encourage self-policing is less populated by crooks than a game (say, Gin or Stud Poker) which tends to lull chumps into un-wariness.

There aren't many foolproof safeguards against the crook. He may be caught with a bottom-dealt ace in his hand occasionally and be black-listed or beaten up, but this is one of his occupational hazards and he knows how to deal with it: by moving on to the next game. He is least apprehensive about the law. It is all but impossible to convict and jail a crook for cheating at cards.

Sure, occasionally a bamboozled player may stop payment on a check after he has gone home, has tossed through the night and has realized that he was probably robbed by dirty means.

But it doesn't happen often, not often enough to drive the cheat out of business. Most amateur card players get a stealthy Masochistic pleasure from paying a debt to a gambling crook — one's honor, you know, and all that.

Is it any wonder that card cheaters stay up nights and pace the daylight streets riddling an angle; that year after year they practice at sleight of hand and distracting illusions; that they invent and have made for themselves crooked decks, mechanical holdouts, mirror gadgets and their many other quaint devices? It's no wonder at all. They want your dollar!

In the end, by the way, they get it — one way or another, by fair means or foul. If they weren't getting it, they'd be extinct. AND THEY AREN'T EXTINCT!
