Angeles.

While, naturally, that didn't do much for her ego, it didn't stop Carter — she was to get the break of her life here — because singing isn't necessarily the end of the world for the former school marm.

"I ran a drug prevention center for kids," she said. "I feel very strongly about helping youngsters and that was a good way of helping. Besides, I always knew enough to keep a 'regular' job until my singing could pay for itself."

Which leads us to the tale of the Big Break, Janis Carter style.

When she moved to Vegas, she said, she began working with well-known vocal coach Adelaide Robbins, who was impressed enough that when Lola Falana was looking for a backup singer to join her group, Carter's name was mentioned. It led to a "closed audition," Carter remembers, "and I got the job."

Needless to say, that break certainly didn't hurt her Las Vegas career any. In other words, it meant she could hang up her other job.

Now she appears around town and spends part of her time working the entertainment scene in Atlantic City.
