Chicago who tired of watching young black children spewed out of local schools as reading-writing-thinking misfits and set up her own special school to postulate her own remedy.

Alice Wilson, the

Hollywood news gal moonlighting as a travel agency clerk, now with the Galaxy Travel firm on Santa Monica in Hollywood, while Lin Hilburn is racking up accolades and good commissions as a mortgage lender with the Castana realtors here, despite the high interest rates. Hilburn, who says he is still a Democrat despite his "I told you so" chortlings after the GOP victory, says he's astounded at how there are many, many borrowers even at interest rates of twenty and thirty percent. Well, there's many a black preacher in the U.S. who years ago got their churches started by borrowing money from private lenders who charged them from twenty-five to fifty cents on the dollar.

RIGHTS

Another endangered piece of civil rights legislation is the Voting Rights Act. Senator Thurmond, the former Dixiecrat, wants to kill it either directly or by making it applicable to all 50 states instead of those that have a proven history of restricting the right to vote.

Making the Act apply to all the states would effectively doom it. Even if such a move passed the Congress it would mean a statute almost impossible to enforce. It's a backdoor way to steal the vote away from black.

Other issues on the horizon, the President will decide early on whether he will aid and abet vicious attempts to deprive black people of their constitutional rights in issues of key importance, or whether he will fulfill his promise to be president of all of the people.

The President swears to uphold the laws of the land, of which none are higher than the Constitution that protects our rights. I hope he will be true to that oath and demonstrate his concern for civil rights.

Standardized scores, college instructors' complaints about the reading ability of college students, the right to Read emphasis, adult literacy, and the level of competence needed for proper functioning in our complex industrial society etc.

Teachers also share the public's concern that reading should be taught and are constantly seeking ways to improve their teaching.

There is no simple route to guaranteeing that everyone will learn how to read or that the teaching or reading may be drastically improved. Research theory and practical experience has taught us a number of important things about the teaching of reading. Reading is a language skill, and is affected by all of the things which affect a child's language development. Physical and mental health, home background, societal pressures, and one's formal learning experiences all may lead to variations in ability to use language and in turn variations in reading achievement.
