All the memories are not happy ones, though. Paige recalled bitterly that after helping the Indians get to the World Series, he was denied a starting assignment in any of the championship games. Instead, he assumed a relief role.

"I came because they had a great staff (Bob Lemon, Bob Feller, Early Wynn) that couldn't get anybody out. I won that Series for them, I know it," he maintained, with a definite trace of bitterness.

He was bitter about having to wait until he was 42 to play in the all-white major leagues. A much younger Jackie Robinson broke the color barrier the year before.

"I was the greatest pitcher in baseball (then). Why did they take Jackie (first)?" said Paige.

"No one could come near me pitchin'," Paige emphasized.

Despite more than a half-century of pitching, Paige said he had arm trouble only once. That he said, was "in '33, in South America, and I got it from swimmin'."

Heart Still in Baseball

The body finally may be slowing, but Paige's heart still is in his beloved game. He's quick to offer strong opinions.

—"Coaches try to change motions and batting stances of young players. They should leave 'em alone."

—"I call this night baseball heaven, playing when it's cool. Guys now don't know how it was. Now it's like falling into a mint of money."

—"Pete Rose is the toughest hitter in the game today. He gets a piece of the ball. I love him; he plays hard, like I did when I pitched."

—"All the young hitters try to hit home runs all the time. There's no more squeeze or drag bunting."

—"Millionaires took over, and changed the game completely."
