ascendency of "big business" over his life.

The prime motivation of "big business" and "big oil" is not to work for a fair social policy for the nation, or to take care of the needy or the unemployed, but that of greed. Greedy people do not create a benevolent society, but a selfish one. The selfishness of "big business" and "big oil" could care less that their advanced technology put people out of work. They could care less about the pollution of our air and the poisoning of our rivers.

Mr. Reagan has implanted in many of the public minds the thought that "big government" is the cause of "big business" and "big oil" not being able to develop a strong economy. In my judgement, this is a vain attempt to shroud the lack of social responsibility on the part of "big business" and "big oil," to hide their illegal acts and allow them to escape accountability for this.

Even to the Black Community, Mr. Reagan has stated that "big government" is no longer "the strong draft horse of minority progress." He asked Blacks at the NAACP convention in Denver, to "hitch up to a fresh horse" of private enterprise if they wanted to obtain economic equality. A dim view of this statement was taken by Black people, because they understand this philosophy very well. The horses of "big business" and "big oil" will have theirs first. As the late Hubert H. Humphrey once stated, "You feed the horses and just maybe the birds will eat." This is an apt description of the Republican philosophy in Washington.

It took the prodding of "big business" by "big government" to begin the elimination of racism and sexism from the plants. It took the prodding of "big business" by "big government" to eliminate the abuse of child labor and to increase safety in the plants and on the jobs.

So long as there are "big business" and "big oil," we need "big government."
