who ended up with egg on the face. The title may not be what the columnist likes, but don't put down what's between the covers. This book is not her only highly-rated literary work; "Sula And The Bluest Eye," her first novel, is a touching and revealing story about the sometimes painful part of growing up black and female.

PUBLISHER'S NOTE: - Dr. Carlton Goodlett, former president and now a director of the National Newspaper Publishers Association (NNPA) and publisher of Reporter Publications, has sent a scorching letter to 45 black corporate directors, accompanied by an equally-scorching editorial that appeared in his San Francisco Sun-Reporter of May 28 denouncing those who serve on corporation boards but "betray the black masses and the Black Press" by providing "no direct assistance, overt or covert, to the cities or to the black struggle for black survival and black liberation." The editorial clearly states the "great disappointment" over the failure of black corporate board members to join in the struggle for the survival and the development of a vigorous Black Press in America and urges them "to rethink your mission as a part of the directorate of corporate America. "Pointing out that "many black ambassadors to corporate America mistakenly believe that their directorships are based primarily on personal merit and abilities," the editorial further states that "their egos have blinded them to reality. Marching feet of the Civil Rights struggle of the '60s and the Black Press literally forced corporate America to respond appropriately with Black appointments." And the editorial names Names.
