not coincidentally, the guerrillas knew precisely where the cars were located when they moved into action and used the Soviet-made autos in their military actions.

The direct complicity of the Soviet Union and its surrogates is difficult to prove beyond a shadow of a doubt. However, the preponderance of evidence suggests that the guerrillas enjoyed the support of the U.S.S.R. and its allies. Such blatant outside intervention in the internal life of a sovereign state deserves to be roundly condemned by international public opinion. Yet many African states have been notably silent in voicing their opposition to this latest instance of Soviet meddling in African affairs. While this silence is clearly dishonest, it is also reflective of the widespread fear by many African leaders of Soviet intervention in their own countries.

The very fact that the coup in Gambia was at all attempted indicates that its Leninist perpetrators were counting on success. They were prepared to abandon even the semblance of due process and fair competition in the arena of electoral politics and to act in a violent and ruthless fashion. For small third world countries such as Gambia there are only two ways to resist such attacks: arming to the teeth and creating a garrison state which heavily taxes already overburdened economics or else counting on the intervention of more powerful allies.

The former approach is untenable and undesirable. The latter approach is filled with uncertainty about the reliability of allies in the face of foreign-backed aggression.

Clearly, there are no easy answers to providing protection for fragile democracies and independent states such as Gambia. However, it is equally clear that the answers does not lie in the abdication by the United States and the West of their responsibilities to the world's more democratic and less repressive governments.

The case of Gambia is not an isolated instance. Rather, it is indicative of a trend that should give pause to those who oppose an active American or Western role in the world.

the above is true, there are certain facts which indicate that there were many people in high places who wanted to turn Jimmy out of office.

Carter inherited many Nixon people through the change in Civil Service which gave these people protected job security. We also know that Carter had antagonized the CIA by insisting on a charter which would keep them out of domestic intelligence. Carter had demanded from the military a zero based budgeting process which required justification and ordering of priorities for federal spending. These demands did not set too well with the military establishment.

It is possible that these interests did participate in Carter's defeat by sandbagging him and preventing him from being effective. In fact, Alexander Haig, who was Nixon's Chief of Staff, was the General in charge of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization under Carter. Haig had every opportunity to do Carter harm politically in Europe or with other allies. He may have, given the fact that Ronald Reagan selected him to be his Secretary of State, a job which clearly calls for a person with diplomatic credentials rather than military ones.

While we are not able to substantiate Bani Sedr's claims, he does raise some interesting questions. Especially so, since Reagan has been so quiet about Ayotollah Khomeini. He may be right in his assessment of these issues.

One thing is certain: Mr. Reagan has been very quiet about Ayotollah Khomeini.
