Yes, South Africa did fight in every war we have been involved in. But the little known fact is, that these South Africans who fought with this country were the English-speaking South Africans, a minority of whites within a minority. Those South Africans who were and are of Dutch descent supported Hilter. They are the majority of a minority of whites.

This close relationship between this country and the South African government is one that will have onerous consequences for the United States. We as a nation are not self-sufficient in our natural resources, which are needed to maintain our industrialized status in our world. All of the resources which we need for this purpose can be found on the continent of Africa. The United States could jeopardize its own exploitation of these resources if it continues to embrace the South African government.

If this country does jeopardize these resources, the resultant actions could be the loss of jobs due to industries moving to other countries, or complete shutdown of these industries. Ford Motor Company indicated the other day that it was considering moving to Japan. This may be the first sign of a major company positioning itself to be able to continue to get the resources needed to make its product.

The military officers from South Africa who were received here in March of this year, the failure of this country to condemn South Africa's intrusion into Angola, and the Rugby team on tour here, will not gain us any favors with Black Africa. These countries will go where they can get help for their people, be it Russia, Red China or Japan.

One other fact the United States has not fitted into its equation about Africa is that, if there is a war, it is doubtful that the blacks in Africa would fight it.
