Brandt led a prestigious panel that advocated more aid. Former head of the World Bank, Robert McNamara, has urged that development aid on a massive scale is in America's self-interest.

And the new French government has stated that developing the poor nations to the point where they could expand trade with the West is crucial to the future of the economies of the industrial nations.

So there is growing recognition that it is in our own self-interest to encourage economic growth throughout the world. The alternative could well be mass starvation in the Third World, economic decline of the industrial countries, and even regional wars that escalate into nuclear confrontations between East and West.

But the current Administration still seems to be indifferent to the need for an international effort to develop the poor nations.

Although its participation at Cancun is a hopeful sign, it has sent strong signals that it would not favor an international Marshall Plan or some similar international effort.

It wants to cut back on foreign aid, restrict it to key countries allied with us, and place greater reliance on private lending and the free market.

Such an approach virtually bars agreements to stabilize prices of raw materials that many poor nations depend on for export earnings.

That is a prescription for continued international strife. It is a reflection of the lack of compassion that has hurt so many of America's poor people. And it is shortsighted, neglecting America's long-term interests in a more stable world.

robbery in high schools "are more likely than non-victims to be offenders themselves."

* Suspension of offending students rarely makes a difference. "Staff members often complain about the unavailability of adequate counseling or psychiatric help."

* School crime and violence are low where principals are dynamic, and where students have access to and can identify with teachers.

Could it be that when we abandoned "the little red schoolhouse" and leaped through "consolidation" to huge schools enrolling thousands, we gave up more than we got? In the old-style smaller school there was no place for troublemakers to hide, because the principal usually knew each student -- and his or her family. Some of today's schools are so large that not only do principals and teachers not know all their students, but they cannot distinguish students from outsiders who peddle dope, steal lunches and purses, foment violence and otherwise create a climate of fear.

There surely is no single or simple panacea for the problem of violence in the schools. But we ought to explore seriously the question of whether we can reverse the trend and limit enrollment in our schools to a level where there can be some meaningful relationship between teachers and students.
