CUTS

mendous impact on older poor people.

It's hard to make a case for those cuts. The savings they represent don't justify the human misery they cause. And some of those cuts reduce opportunities for the dependent elderly to become contributors to our economy.

The Administration wants to eliminate funding for the Senior Community Service Employment Program, which helps older citizens find employment.

Many of the elderly don't have the skills or the education to land jobs on their own. They need counselling, training, and assistance. This program gives it to them.

It helps move many off the welfare rolls and onto the payrolls of private industry. It brings hope and a new zest for life to older people who might just have given up. It helps them fill productive jobs serving community needs.

Why cut it? It just doesn't make any kind of sense to do away with a program that helps the elderly poor pay taxes instead of consuming them.

The Senior Community Service Employment Program ought to continue. And other programs aimed at helping the aged poor also should be spared the budget-cutters' axe.
