struction than either rural or suburban schools. And pupils in predominately minority schools get only about half the computer use time that students in predominately white working class schools do, despite the similarities in student backgrounds.

Only 14 percent of students in predominately minority elementary schools get time on computers, compared to almost half the students in school in affluent districts.

Working class white elementary schools tend to focus their computer time on their best students while predominately black schools are far more likely to give the limited computer time to their below-average students.

That means the students most likely to benefit from more advanced computer skills in predominately black schools are denied the experience, while their white peers in low income predominately white schools get the skills they will then use in doing more advanced computer work in high school, and in advancing on to college and the prime job market.

This is not to suggest that below-average students don't benefit from the remedial work and the drilling in basic skills that computers can provide. But it does imply that the students who can benefit most from computer training aren't getting it.

With the student-computer ratio standing at 233-1 in predominately black elementary schools and only 183-1 in white ones, there is clearly a need for more widespread accessibility of computers for schools in minority neighborhoods.

But as important is the need to reassess how those computers are used, and to equip black youngsters with the math and computer skills they need for the jobs of the future.
