Having just viewed an outstanding vocational program offered at a comprehensive high school, Mr. Olsen's comment intrigued me about prevocational classes at the junior high school level, and I was much impressed with his high regard for the principal of Cashman Junior High School, Mr. Sidney J. Franklin. I should quickly add that Cashman Junior High School enrolls ninth grade students, and many of these students enter Clark High School as sophomores. In reality, the first year of high school is being offered at Cashman Junior High School.

When I visited this school and asked the principal about his prevocational training programs, he was quick not to tell me about the programs, but to show me. Classes in home economics, wood shop, and typing were available to his students. Of particular interest was the woods class being taught by Lyle Snell. The class project for the first semester was the production of wood cases for clocks. These unique projects come in all sizes and dimensions, and the quality of the work was outstanding.

Vocational training can be obtained in your home high school. It can be started at the junior high level. What you need to do is acquaint yourself with the opportunities and if you have questions about the program, don't hesitate to ask either Mr. Olsen or Mr. Franklin.

Being among the Ethiopian Jews was an inspiring experience. They are a gentle, friendly people whose determination to succeed in their new land is evident. Center administrators told stories of how the Ethiopians insisted on double-shift language instruction classes, and of how they sought outside jobs to supplement their government stipends and to save for the future.

One hopes that future will be bright. It is hard to go to another country and start a new life. It is doubly hard to go from a traditional, village-centered society to a modern, industrial one.

But from what I saw, I am convinced they will make it. They are motivated to become independent members of a nation they had prayed to be part of. And they are among people who welcome them and seek to help.

There's a lesson here for Americans that says that a positive, caring policy can help people to make it. What I saw in Israel suggests that the goal of an open, pluralistic, integrated society is within reach. And that encourages those of us in America who still see it as a distant dream.

high wages. The talented are offered entry into prep schools and colleges. Some are getting training in computers.

Ultimately — at the end of about a year — families will be assisted to relocate into permanent homes. The Israelis want the newcomers to be fully integrated into the society, and want to resettle them in groups large enough to maintain their own cultural traditions yet small enough to keep from becoming a ghetto.

Will Israeli society integrate black Jews or will it reject them? From what I saw, there can be little doubt that they will be fully integrated into the larger society.

For example, one of the absorption centers was located in an upper class neighborhood in a seaside resort community. The neighbors have welcomed the Ethiopians into their homes and volunteer their help at the center.

Contrast that with the outcry you get in an American suburb when it is proposed to start a halfway house or a social service
