society of alcohol hits $130 billion.

We know that the causes of alcohol abuse, like drug abuse, are very complicated, often buried deep within the individual person. But adult society creates a climate that encourages abuse when we send our young people caution-free messages that encourage them to drink.

*Messages from Parents and Adults. If we often drink too much, we are in effect telling our children that that is permissible behavior. Children take their cues from parents and other adults in their lives. Our example is especially crucial in this area: studies have shown that the children of alcoholics face a much higher risk of alcoholism. We can send the right signals by behaving responsibly about alcohol-holding consumption down to a healthy level, and seeking help or expecting a spouse, sibling or parent to seek help if there is a serious problem.

*Messages from the Media. When our children turn on the television, they see their favorite sports entertainment idols selling them beer. Parents and children and those who participate in such ads must weigh the glamorous messages against the human consequences. There's nothing glamorous about losing your job or your family or friends to an alcoholic habit.

*Messages from Uncle Sam. Money talks very loudly to young people, and right now alcohol and its resulting burdens are in effect being subsidized by our government. The tax on a glass of wine is less than one cent, on a bottle of beer less than three cents, and on a mixed drink eleven cents. Taxes on beer and wine haven't been raised since 1951. No wonder the amount of alcohol-related tax money the federal government takes in is dwarfed by the money that alcohol and its resulting problems cost our federal treasury as the National Alcohol Tax Coalition reports. That is why the Children's Defense Fund, a member of this coalition, supports raising taxes on alcohol. The new revenue can be used to curb the deficit and invest in alcohol abuse prevention. Most important, higher taxes may help deter alcohol abuse.
