health care. More specifically, services are designed to:

1. reduce infant mortality and the incidence of preventable diseases and disabilities among children, reduce the need for impatient and long-term care services, and increase the number of children immunized against disease; and,

2. provide rehabilitation services for blind and disabled persons under the age of 16 receiving benefits under the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) program for disabled children; and,

3. provide services in locating medical care for children who are disabled or who are suffering from conditions leading to a disability; and,

4. enable the Secretary of Health and Human Services to provide grants for special projects to promote child and maternal health.

Every child has the right to a healthy body. By supporting and expanding quality programs like the MCH block grant and other services the federal government can work more ambitiously toward ensuring this right.

of affirmative action by the Supreme Court, which handed down the decisions upsetting local set-aside programs.

Still to come is another test of affirmative action -- the Court will soon rule on the Federal Communications Commission's policy of giving minority applicants for broadcasting licenses special consideration, based on the nation's interest in diverse ownership of the nation's airwaves and on correcting past discrimination that kept blacks out of the broadcasting business.

Despite this, the Justice Department is actually urging the court to overrule the agency's program -- a baseless move that can only damage the Administration's standing among African Americans.

Sound national policies and wiser use of the vast buying power represented by African Americans could help black business grow and narrow the racial gap in business and in income.
