For The Ladies

For every Black adult who says Black teenagers don't care about their community, a chorus of teenagers responds that their community doesn't care about them. We've got to move away from such self-fulfilling pronouncements and get on with the critical business of saving and shoring up a generation of Black youth so that when their time comes to take charge, the whole community will benefit.

Many teens already are in a better position to make a difference than we might sometimes think, and are doing so in a number of communities. If you're an educator or community worker, for example, consider a new video released by the Public Broadcasting System (PBS).

"Cool Moves — Teens Together," is part of PBS outreach efforts to get everyone involved with improving their communities. The video has excerpts from a national documentary aired several months ago, highlighting some of the wonderful work young people are doing for their communities. For example:

 In Dorchester, Massachusetts, the community established The All Dorchester Sports League to put youngsters of all races and backgrounds together in a year round, team-support environment. This eight-year-old program has seen over 4,000 youngsters participate in ten different sports throughout the year.

. Minneapolis, Minnesota, is the home of the American Variety Theater Company housed at the Capri Theater. The inner-city 4-H Club sponsors the program. The young actors learn to work together, trust each other, and be creative.

. The D. Edward Wells Youth Federal Credit Union in Springfield, Massachusetts has served the minority community since 1958, and three years ago expanded its services to youth. The Youth Credit Union is run, owned and operated by youth. It teaches them to spend and manage money wisely.

The two other programs featured in the video are "Clean and Green" of Los Angeles, which teaches youngsters to take pride in their community's appearance, and Club MQT of Marquette, Michigan, a teen owned and operated dance club.

Having an opportunity to join a structured program not only takes youngsters off the streets, it can mean the difference between a productive life or a wasted one. As one Minneapolis youth puts it, "If the Capri Theater wasn't there, I don't think I'd be alive right now." (See Childwatch, Page 18)
