"I was one of those who had the odds stacked against me. I was raised in the projects ... but I never sat on my porch having project dreams," Lawrence Weekly told a crowd of about 100 during the First Black College Attendees Luncheon, Saturday, August 7 at Frank Hawkins Sports Lounge.

Weekly was the keynote speaker at the luncheon and fund-raiser. The goal of the event was to raise financial support for local college students who are attending or plan to attend black colleges or universities.

The fund-raiser luncheon was the brainchild of Assemblymen Wendell P. Williams. Williams said that the students would keep 90 percent of the funds they raise for the luncheon to help with their college education.

Weekly, a graduate of Grambling State University in Grambling, La., told the audience that students get a sense of care and concern when attending a (See Black Colleges, Page 10)

Mayor Jones closed her brief letter by requesting that the issue be placed on the August 10 meeting agenda to allow for review, discussion and possible action on procurement and con-

CONTRACTING AND PROCUREMENT AT RECENT MEETING tracting procedures. She further requested a 12 month analysis of "those businesses holding contracts and providing services to LVCVA.*

The irony of this meeting is that it comes on the heels of a LVCVA roundtable discussion at R&R Advertising with many African American community leaders concerning the exclusion of minorities in nationwide advertisement blitzes.

Mayor Jones asked what steps were being taken to make contract procurement procedures "race neutral." Other concerns were: were local publications such as EL MUNDO and SENTINEL-VOICE being utilized; bonding requirements and aggressive campaigns to educate minority and women-owned firms about how to secure government contracts - she reiterated that many minority-owned firms don't know what the procurement procedures are and therefore make no attempt to secure those (See LVCVA, Page 10)

SPECIAL TO THE SENTINEL-VOICE

By Dennis Schatzman, Staff Writer, Los Angeles Sentinel

Thanks to a federal judge's wristslapping sentence given to two officers held responsible for the major-league beating inflicted upon Rodney King in a parking lot March 3, 1991, African Americans in the southland and across the nation now have a new code word to deal with: provocation.

U.S. Federal District judge John G. Davies reduced what would have been a mandatory 6-8 year sentence for former Los Angeles Police Department officers (Sgt.) Stacey Koon and Laurence Powell to just 2 and 1/2 years each because in the judge's estimation the first 52 of the 58 blows-or the blows struck in the first 67 seconds of the famous video tape-that struck King in the face, arms and torso were "objectively reasonable" because the motorist "provoked" the beating by his "reactionary conduct."

Fifteen or more state and local law enforcement officers surrounded King when he was apprehended following a car that chase ended in Lakewood Terrace. But four of the officers, however, felt provoked enough to bludgeon King with nearly 60 blows with metal batons and numerous kicks, breaking bones, damaging eye sockets and creating outstanding bruises and con-

The federal judge, saying the men posed no threat to society and had no previous criminal records, allowed Koon and Powell to remain free until Sept. 27 when they begin serving the prison terms.

Davies, a native Australian, first announced from the bench that based on mandatory federal guidelines, Koon and Powell would have to serve between 70 and 87 months in a federal correctional facility.

But the judge reduced the sentences and imposed no fines or demanded restitution for King after hearing arguments from defense attorneys, that the defendants were perceived to be racists and would be targets for abuse in prison, has lost their jobs, and would continue to suffer for the rest of their
