

Dream

And they should recognize that the reputation of modern-day American journalism as a "watchdog" of society largely derives from its exemplary coverage of African-Americans' struggle for civil rights in the South in the early 1960s.

The irony, of course, was that the white media organizations of the North were then nearly as segregated in de facto terms as any Southern institution.

The Kerner Commission made that paradox a central feature of its report released the month before King was killed.

His assassination provided the moral force behind the report's recommendations, including one urging the mainstream media to integrate its ranks.

How devastating it would be to the mainstream media's reputation if it were to retreat from diversity now.

And such a retreat would beg the question: If media outlets, who cover the diversity controversy, scale back their own hiring and promotion practices, can we trust them to cover broader controversy fairly?
