smoke, the issue of black lung disease has been forgotten, Jackson said. Black lung, he said, is a serious disease that's contracted in coal mines and kills 1,500 people each year.

"These coal miners know it, the insurance companies know it and Americans must come to grips with it," Jackson said. "These coal miners are contracting a disease in these mountains." Voting is key, Jackson said, to eliminating Appalachia's woes.

"When you use that vote, whether you're a mine worker, a steel worker or a chemical worker, whether you're white or black, we can all work together to build a train for a midnight train to Georgia and put Newt Gingrich on that train," Jackson said. "That's what we can do."

Jackson said all Americans are entitled to the same health benefits that the members of Congress receive.

"You are paying for their health insurance, and they won't pay for your benefits. It ain't right," Jackson said.

Meanwhile, Jackson said a paradox continues to haunt Appalachia: some of the richest land, and some of the poorest people.

"What you do have are its mountains, its rivers, its lakes," Jackson said. "What you don't have is an economic magnet."

site, much of District Six is still wasteland. Its razing caused such an outcry that private developers were never found.

Today most of the area is grassy and desolate, dotted by churches and mosques that were the only buildings left untouched by the bulldozers. Piles of rubble poke out of the weeds.

More than 6,000 families — some 30,000 people — say they owned or rented houses in District Six and want to be resettled in the new project, expected to cost $84 million in a mix of state funds and cash from private developers.

Construction will start once all parties decide what type of housing should be built and who qualifies for resettlement.

Ebrahim believes he may be able to move back late next year.

school's student body is black. Messer said he had understood that his race was one of the reasons he was assigned to Matthew Gilbert in the first place.

"That's why I was put there," he said. "That's what they told me the community wanted."

Gibson said she plans to schedule a meeting between the district superintendent and community members who want Willis replaced.
