Review

flowers don't last for long though due to the murder of Joe's friend Linda. Eventually, love prevails and Patrice insists upon helping Joe solve the mystery of his friend's death. Patrice and Joe embark on a dangerous quest to find out why Linda was murdered.

Leading lady Tracey Ross is merely a beautiful ornament in this film. She parades about in sexy clothes and exposes her breasts. Although her acting is better than that of John Kennedy Horne which is not saying much, there is a dearth of acting talent on the part of this former model.

John Kennedy Horne's portrayal of Kirkman was completely laughable. I saw more talent in my beginner's acting class. His delivery was so wooden and unemotional that I'm now convinced that some mad scientist has created a robot that resembles a human being.

Sheryl Lee Ralph is a talented actress and let's hope that a fat paycheck was the reward for taking her role. Thankfully, her character dies early in the film so Ralph didn't have to continue to horribly overact for the remaining hour and twenty minutes or so of the film.

Some of the scenes of this movie were so laughable that the film should have been marketed as a comedy, not a serious action thriller/romance. In a completely unnecessary scene Patrice's shapely roommate "dirty dances" by herself. I can only guess that the scene was to further enforce the fact that the promiscuous Caroline was in the mood for love, if you catch my drift. Furthermore, the action scenes are so horribly staged with their unconvincing fight scenes and implausible escapes that even an action junkie would walk out of the theater.

Unconditional Love is a disorganized mess of a film. It's 105 minutes that could be better spent contemplating your navel, watching the Teletubbies, or finally getting that root canal you've been putting off for years.
