Segregation

executive director of the ACLU-Mississippi, says he "really regretted it took so long because many of the people are dead and they can't seek justice for what was done to them."

Minor speculates the documents yet to be released will also do little to expose racism's secrets.

The files already released reveal a "Keystone Cops" approach to keeping track of anyone and anything even remotely considered a threat to white supremacy.

The documents, some just scribbled on scraps of paper or newspaper clippings, show the commission's spy tentacles reached into almost all areas of Mississippi life, from small black church gatherings to college campuses.

Apparently nothing was too innocent or too obvious to escape commission scrutiny. The license tag numbers of cars parked outside NAACP meetings were written down. Even after the bodies of civil rights workers Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Chaney were unearthed in Neshoba County, the commission sent a representative to sketch a crude map of where the bodies had been buried.

Commission records also suggest a motive for the 1959 murder of Mack Charles Parker, a black truck driver who was dragged from the Poplarville jail by a mob, two days before he was to stand trial for the alleged rape of a pregnant white woman.

The Associated Press reported in 1959 that Parker may have been killed because the mob believed a jury would free him.

But in Sovereignty Commission files, agent Zack J. Van Landingham offered another view, writing in a memo to himself: "One of the main contentions of those who defended the mob action at Poplarville was that the Negro attorney, Jess Brown, was to question the white woman victim of the rape."

"This the mob sought to prevent by lynching Mack Parker."

The commission also kept an eye on celebrities and entertainers, including Elvis Presley, B.B. King, James Brown, the Rolling Stones, Sammy Davis Jr. and Harry Belafonte.

Folk singer Joan Baez drew the commission's scrutiny when an informant reported she was scheduled to perform at a festival at Tougaloo College, a predominantly black private school. The commission had targeted the school because of its racially mixed faculty.

Protest

Then Sharpton announced that Mayor Giuliani would not give the order to arrest them.

That's when they and other protesters entered the building. Cops put them in plastic handcuffs and charged them with criminal trespass. A total of 14 people were arrested.

"The demonstrators this morning did exactly what we did every other day, and they did not arrest us," Sharpton said. "Then we went inside, and they decided to arrest us."

Giuliani denied having any conversation about arresting or cuffing the demonstrators and called the demonstration a "publicity stunt."

"He is right," Sharpton replied. "We want to keep the public's attention on brutality. That's what Martin Luther King taught us."

After being released, Dinkins said he's waiting for Giuliani to establish order within the Police Department.

"It's not just these four [cops involved in the Diallo shooting]," Dinkins told The Post. "It's the whole attitude of this police department. They continually seem to operate as if the end justifies the means, and it doesn't."

"This kind of thing is going to happen to somebody who is of such stature and of the right ethnic and religious background. [Then] he will have to notice it."

Rangel said there would be more of an outcry if a horse had been shot at 41 times.

"I was shocked that the other clergy, Catholic and Protestant, Jews and gentiles and Muslims, didn't see this as an immoral act," he said.

Rangel appealed to other members of the police force to step forward.

"We need them to say, 'Not in my New York City Department do you do this,'" he said.

Sharpton promised more high-profile protesters.

"This will go on every day until these four policemen face justice," he said.
