

Cops

(Continued from Page 3) graduating from the police academy in January, he delivered supplies for the school district, worked in a residential home and restocked restaurants with soda syrup.

"I never even thought about being a cop. I thought I would be a laborer, but I knew I didn't want to be a laborer all my life," he said.

One recent night, Exilien drove with his partner through Boston's Haitian-dominated Mattapan neighborhood, where Exilien grew up.

Exilien's understanding of the community is invaluable, especially now that killings and other violent crime have decreased and much of his shift is spent mediating domestic disputes, said his partner, Philip Morgan.

"These are highly emotional situations," Morgan said. If the participants can identify with the officer, "that's a lot more helpful."

These ethnic officers are already proving their worth in many towns.

A Vietnamese officer in Chamblee, Ga., prevented a potentially wrenching child abuse investigation when he recognized that a little girl's bruises were not the result of a beating, but of hot oil rubbed on her back with a coin — a folk cure for a fever.

In St. Paul, the Hmong

tradition of kidnapping teenage girls as brides caused a lot of anger and confusion. Now Hmong officers sit down with the "kidnapper" and the girl's family, explain American law to them and ask the two sides to work out the problem.
