

Zimbabwe urged to accredit observers

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States urged Zimbabwe on Monday to quickly accredit American observers for this weekend's fiercely contested parliamentary elections.

"Neither the National Democratic Institute nor the International Republican Institute have yet received their accreditation despite multiple requests to the government" in Harare, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said.

He said the authorities in the southern African nation have provided no explanation for the delay.

Boucher said the United States was ready to fund more than 10,000 observers for the election, in addition to the ones from the two U.S. institutes. He said he did not know whether U.S. diplomats in Zimbabwe would need special accreditation to observe the voting.

Also Monday, the European Union confirmed that Zimbabwe's government had refused to accredit 17 EU-sponsored African election observers who were to monitor the election. The government said the 10 Kenyans and seven Nigerians were not European nationals and should have been sponsored by their own countries, EU official Tana de Zulueta said.

Political violence has scarred campaigning for the election that poses the biggest threat to President Robert Mugabe's ruling party since he led the nation to independence in 1980. At least 31 people, mostly opposition supporters, have died in political violence since February, when ruling party militants and war veterans began illegally occupying more than 1,400 white-owned farms.

Mugabe has ordered police not to remove illegal squatters from white-owned farms; insisting land-hungry blacks are protesting unfair land ownership by whites.
