Teen virginity pledgers delay sex

WASHINGTON (AP) -Just saying no to sex works, at least for a while. A study found that teen-agers who publicly pledged to remain virgins until marriage delayed having sex about 18 months longer than other teens.

Among those who formally promised to avoid unmarried sex, about 50 percent remained virgins until about age 20, said Peter S. Bearman, a Columbia University sociologist and coauthor of a study in the American Journal of Sociology.

Among nonpledgers, he said, 50 percent were no longer virgins by age 17.

'The average delay among pledgers is 18 months," Bearman said in an interview Wednesday. "That is significant. And that is a pure pledge effect."

Bearman and his co-author, Hannah Brueckner, a sociologist at Yale University, analyzed the effect of virginity pledges on the behavior of teen-agers enrolled in the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health, a federally funded survey of children in the seventh through 12th grades.

Data from the study suggested that by 1995 a churchled, voluntary effort had prompted about 2.5 million teen-age boys and girls to make spoken or written pledges to refrain from sex until marriage.

In their study, Bearman and Brueckner analyzed data from interviews of 20,000 teen-age virgins in 1994 and

A follow-up survey in 1997 included 14,000 of those in the original study.

Bearman acknowledged that some of the characterismake the abstinence pledge would have led them to avoid early sex anyway. But even when the researchers made statistical allowance for these factors, "there was an additional delay added by the pledge," he said.

"The more religious kids pledge, as do kids who are more oriented toward school," said Bearman. "Those are protective effects that would delay their entry pledge effect is in addition to that.'

The virginity pledges seemed to have the greatest effect on those who took the oath at age 16 to 17, while there was little effect found for those pledging at 18 or

The effect of pledging earlier, at age 14 or 15, depended tics that would lead kids to on the students' social environments, the study found.

Ironically, Bearman said the more popular taking the pledge becomes in a school, the less effective it becomes.

The maximum effect, he said, comes when about 30 percent of students in a school pledge.

As the total reaches 40 and 50 percent, the pledge effect is eroded.

In effect, he said, as soon as the virginity pledge beinto sex anyway. But the comes too common "and something that everybody does," the persuasive, social impact is lost.

For the whole study group, Bearman cited a "significant" difference between the percentage of pledgers and nonpledgers who remained virgin through their teen years.

Powell

In his autobiography, My American Journey, Powell openly condemned his boss Bush Sr. for making escaped Black convict Willie Horton the poster boy in his 1988 presidential campaign for crime to inflame white vot-

And in an interview after the O.J. Simpson trial he cited the racist remarks of rogue LAPD cop Mark Fuhrman in the trial, as proof that racism is still very much alive and well in America.

None of Powell's utterances sat well with Republican ultra-conservatives. Pat Buchanan, and dozens of rightist Republican groups issued saber rattling public statements that they would not support Powell as president in 1996 and even frowned on him being chosen as eventual presidential candidate Bob Dole's running mate.

Powell is not an Olympian perched political outsider but a consummate team player that cut his teeth in two Republican conservative administrations.

Like a good general he took orders, followed direcfrom the Republican White House political script. He will do the same as Secretary of, State and he will be applauded for it. But as a wannabe President it would have been a far different story. Powell's mythmakers ignore this.
