

Steele

This rebounding movement Steele has spearheaded has now gone international — particularly in the Middle East with offices in Israel and Palestine. "We're around the world," Steele says proudly. "I'll be going to Cuba in four or five weeks to set up a conflict resolution center. [In] Italy and throughout Europe we'll be going to establish conflict resolution centers."

The Tuscaloosa native admits there has been some criticism of his international forays and questioning whether SCLC is foregoing pressing domestic concerns. "International concerns are domestic concerns because you are in a global society," Steele counters. "Our kids are going global; the jobs are abroad."

When Steele assesses what went wrong with SCLC and what contributed to its precipitous decline as a civil rights force in America, he said, "We forgot our mission. The mission is to stay in the streets, to advocate for the least of these. We left the streets and went to the suites. That's where we made our mistake. You never leave your base; you never abandon your cornerstone." Yet, the charismatic politico is quick to quip, "It's a new day and a new way for SCLC."

Steele says poverty, violence and racism were the three societal ills that topped Dr. King's agenda and those are still the most pressing issues impacting Black folks today.

"The Movement is still alive," Steele passionately contends. "But people are still waiting for a Dr. King to come back and he's not going to come back. But his spirit, and his teachings and his principles are here. But how can you teach his principles and theories if you don't have an institution, if you don't have [a robust] SCLC?"

Inevitably, the New Orleans colleges will be different. But their supporters insist they can be strong again — and that they are poised to take advantage of the unique opportunities created by the hurricane.

"Today we think about the state-of-the-art climbing wall and about the facilities that are so much a part of a modern university," said Brown President Ruth Simmons, a Dillard alumna. "It's true that many of those things we take for granted, they will not have. But that is not to suggest that learning won't take place in a powerful way."

Touring Dillard's campus for the first time since the storm, junior Ciara Jeffrey shook her head last week at the state of the campus, even four months into the repairs.

The elegant buildings still gleamed white, and all the pillars of the "Avenue of Oaks" remained. But the lawns were a muddy mess,
