

Robinson

(Continued from Page 20) even after he retired as a player. But he always found a way to stay in the game as a manager, coach or administrator.

"People have to like you," he said. "I guess the bottom line is that for 50 years, people wanted to pay you for what you're doing."

He became baseball's first Black manager in 1975 with the Cleveland Indians, where he spent two years as a player-manager. He also managed in San Francisco and Baltimore, winning AL manager of the year with the Orioles in 1989.

After working as vice-president in the commissioner's office in charge of on-field discipline, he took over the Montreal Expos in 2002. It was supposed to be a one-year deal, but he settled into the job and accompanied the franchise when it moved to Washington last year. He now needs only two victories to become the 53rd manager to reach 1,000 wins.

Robinson turned 70 last August and acknowledges that as a player, he wouldn't have much use for a septuagenarian manager.

"I'd tell him he's way past his prime, and to go on to something else," he said.

Robinson's not inclined to heed such advice. When the Nationals play their next opponent he'll be in the dug-out, ready to put 50 years of experience to use.
