Bailey

Bailey Jr., an accomplished electric bass player in his own right, was dressed in his signature white suit and white shoes. His son Carlos, a country and western singer, was dressed in a classic Western hat and purple suit.

The five-hour long Medallion Ceremony, which also honored Bailey's fellow inductees — country music male vocalist Glenn Campbell and the band Alabama — drew several hundred invited guests.

During a two-hour reception that preceded the formal program the Bailey's were embraced by well wishers, some of whom spoke of adding a few more local touches to the honors for Bailey, including possibly naming a portion of 12th Avenue South in Bailey's honor. Bailey lived in the Edgehill area for much of his life after being let go by the Grand Ole Opry.

The formal program honoring Bailey, Campbell and Alabama, featured several artists paying tribute to Bailey. At one point Joe Filisko, a harp player from Chicago, brought the audience to its feet in a standing ovation after playing "Fox Chase," one of Bailey's favorite tunes.

Veteran Nashville country bandleader Charlie McCoy, who learned to play harmonica in Bailey's style, treated the audience to his rendition of Bailey's signature tune "Pan American Blues."

At another point during the ceremony DeFord Bailey Jr., who learned to play the harp from his father, and Carlos Bailey, came to the stage and played "Swing Low Sweet Chariot," described as one of his father's favorite songs. A few moments later, Carlos Bailey joined his father on stage, backed by the CMA Medallion All Stars band, and sang a tribute to his grandfather called "When DeFord Bailey Died."

Bailey Jr. again played harp as part of the song.

After the song, the entire family was called to the front of the Ford Theater room at the Hall of Fame and Museum and the Hall of Fame Medallion was presented to Bailey Jr., who accepted on behalf of his father, mother and rest of the Bailey family.

As the award was presented, the audience rose to its feet in a standing ovation honoring Bailey and his contributions to the field of country music.

Hall of Fame officials were diplomatic in addressing the long running controversy over Bailey's denial of induction into the Hall of Fame. One member of the band Alabama was less so, however. Echoing the sentiments of many of the audience during his acceptance remarks for his medallion, the band member said a bit of "justice" had been achieved, gesturing to the Bailey family seated along with other honorees in the front row of Ford Theater at the Hall of Fame and Museum. The audience applauded in agreement.
