 mistakenly included in COBRA maps after being mixed up with adjacent or overlapping state parks. Many argued that their houses were built well before COBRA was enacted, and they point out that neighboring communities — sometimes just blocks away — are free of COBRA restrictions.

In April, Grayton Beach resident Cynthia Turner told a congressional panel that she and her fellow property owners could go "permanently homeless" if the insurance stopped.

"It is an outrage ...all because they erroneously said this was part of Grayton Beach State Park?" she said in an interview. "I'm a middle-class homeowner."

However, COBRA backers point out that structures were readily visible on maps that Congress initially adopted and that lawmakers knew existing houses would be included. Under COBRA, such homeowners are entitled to keep federal insurance unless they file claims costing more than 50 percent of the property value or if they substantially improve or expand their homes.

Critics question whether "middle-class" homeowners are in jeopardy. For example, one Memphis, Tenn., family that owns three of the vacant lots covered by the Grayton Beach bill also owns millions of dollars in nearby property. As for Turner, besides her house she and her husband own a vacant lot about a half mile away valued at $675,000 by the county tax office.

Home prices on Jekyll Island, meanwhile, are increasingly approaching $1 million.

"In the galaxy of federal subsidies, I don't think there's one that is so pointedly subsidizing wealthy people," Houck said. "What happened to getting the government out of the hair of the private economy and letting the market work?"

Rep. Jack Kingston, a Republican from Savannah who sponsored the Jekyll Island bill, agreed that it raises valid questions about the system. But he said he took up the cause because he believed his constituents were being unfairly harmed by a map error. And, he added, "it's better to have people insured than to have to pay the money out in the wake of a disaster like Katrina."
