portionately on telephone services, AT&T Wireless may not be spending enough with Black media outlets and vendors.

Bradley said AT&T Wireless doesn't mind disclosing what the company spends with disadvantaged communities, but will not make public its figures for each group. Even so, he said, the company will continue to explore ways to better interact with people of color, including the Black Press. He cites a list of honors the company has received for its work with vendors and its overall diversity efforts.

He said that while much of the material used in telephones are manufactured overseas, AT&T Wireless has been innovative in other ways, such as requiring outside law firms it hires to assign a certain percentage of billable hours for Black lawyers on their staffs.

began an initiative with several historically Black colleges, which it hopes to expand, that could lead to permanent employment. Additionally, Bradley said, AT&T is partnering with the National Urban League to find employees in various cities.

He said the company is looking forward to doing even more.

"We need to be sure that communities that we're doing business in and that we live in are prospering," Bradley said. "And that's what minority- and women-owned business spending does. It drives cash into the community that will make it a more robust community that will hopefully become customers of ours."
