

Clemens

There was one wide-eyed fan moment, when Rep. William Clay, D-Mo., relayed to Clemens that a colleague "wants to know what uniform you will wear into the Hall of Fame?"

When it was over, Clemens shook hands with Davis, then left through a back door. Clemens later told reporters: "I'm very thankful and very grateful for this day to come. I'm glad for the opportunity finally."

Fisk

O'Keeffe donated to Fisk because the school, founded in 1866, educated Blacks at a time when the South was segregated.

"The donation to an African-American university made a public statement and gesture to heighten the consciousness of a segregated society that African-Americans and their institutions ranked equally, among and as a vital part of American society and the cultural arts," Lyle wrote in her ruling.

Lyle noted that when O'Keeffe gave artworks to two other institutions she gave them the right to sell those pieces after 25 years. "This right was not given to Fisk," she wrote.

"She had no personal connection to Fisk from which one could conclude that she had an intent to have the [artist's] collection used to keep Fisk in operation."

After-hours messages left with the Crystal Bridges Museum's public relations firm and the president of the O'Keeffe Museum were not immediately returned.

"While it's obviously not the outcome we fought for, it does not diminish our fundraising efforts... we will defend vigorously against the O'Keeffe Museum's effort to take this collection away from Fisk," Fisk spokesman Ken West said. "They'll have the fight of their lives."
