campaign has taken to the airwaves and has her husband, former President Bill Clinton back campaigning in North Carolina this weekend for the fourth week in a row, the Obama campaign is also blitzing the state with a massive voter registration drive, celebrity appearances, and coordinated TV and radio strategy, as well.

The prize — the lion's share of North Carolina's 134 delegates and 19 superdelegates, most of whom are expected to publicly endorse right before the May 6 primary.

Obama's pull in North Carolina is so strong, even the two leading Democratic candidates for governor, Lt. Gov. Beverly Perdue and State Treasurer Richard Moore, have both endorsed the Illinois senator, and are even pictured with him on their campaign literature in hopes that the tremendous Black vote Obama will attract will also flow their way.

With Sen. Obama tightening the race in Pennsylvania against Sen. Clinton for the April 22 primary (both he and Clinton debated on Wednesday), supporters are hopeful he can significantly build on his 135-delegate lead on his way to the Democratic nomination in August, and is eventual face-off against presumptive Republican nominee John McCain in November.

There's no question Michelle Obama is doing her part.

At Reynolds Coliseum, she drew an estimated 5,700 excited supporters, the most she's drawn anywhere without a big celebrity like Oprah Winfrey or Stevie Wonder sharing the stage with her.

Her message to the faithful was simple: her husband is ready to lead.

"We don't need somebody who can just do the same thing better," she said. "We need somebody who is going to fundamentally shake up the way politics works in this country, and what we've seen in this campaign this whole year is that Barack Obama is the only candidate doing it, right now, and starts the way he's raised his money, how he's engaged a whole grassroots movement... that is something his opponent [Sen. Clinton] hasn't done — brought in new money, new people buying into this process, not with $2300, but with $23, $50, $10... He's done it with the grassroots movement he's built up all over the state. So he's harnessing this energy like the community organizer that he is — someone who understands the power of engaging people, showing them their self-interest, and getting them working on the ground... Those are just a couple of the ways he's reshaped the political paradigm," she continued, "and I don't think that there is any other candidate in this race — at all — who could, or would have done it, because many of them have been here for a long time and haven't done it before. They had a chance to do it, but they haven't done it... And he's doing it."
