

ASK DEANNA!
*Real People,
Real Advice*

Ask Deanna! Is an advice column known for its fearless approach to reality-based subjects!

Dear Deanna!

I learned that my husband has been cheating on me. I am currently trying to decide if I can forgive him and if we can salvage our 10-year marriage. He told me that he was very sorry for what he has done but I could have reduced the pain if I hadn't followed him to the hotel and caught him. He says all men cheat at some time and it's a man's DNA. He then pointed out our male friends that cheat and named a few celebrities. If things don't work out is this what I have to look forward to in a marriage?

Terrribly Disappointed
Online Reader

Dear Disappointed:

Your husband is sorry indeed because he got busted with another woman and tried to flip the script and put the blame on you. All men don't cheat and infidelity has to do with lust, immaturity and being selfish. If he and his friends all have cheating in common, they're birds of a feather that shouldn't be married. Your husband has confirmed he's a cheater and he'll cheat again if you stay and accept it. Life is too short and if you find yourself in another relationship with a good man, give him a fair chance with a clean slate and you won't be disappointed.

Dear Deanna!

I'm in a relationship and I think my jealousy is going to ruin things. My girlfriend is attractive, friendly and outgoing. It drives me crazy when I see men misinterpret this as flirting and start trying to get with her. I have to control myself because I've made myself look like a fool several times by jumping on guys when there was no need. How do I deal with this?

Rob
Detroit, MI

Dear Rob:

You have a serious issue that needs to be addressed. This woman is not your wife and you're taking things in the wrong direction. You can begin to get a handle on this by sharing your feelings and working together to pinpoint her behavior that bothers you. If this doesn't help, you personally need to seek therapy to identify the root cause of your insecurities.

Dear Deanna!

I wanted to drop you a few lines about my ex-girlfriend. We broke up because I didn't want her anymore and just told her the relationship was over. I replaced the locks and changed all my phone numbers. She can't accept the fact it's over and took things to another level when she keyed my car. She keeps harassing me and I keep cursing her out and now I feel like hitting her. What do I do?

Sean
Astoria, NY

Dear Sean:

The car repair should be easy unless you don't have car insurance. As for your stalker, most of the blame is on you. She is reacting this way because apparently you caught her off guard with the break-up. You didn't "man-up" with respect and concern nor did you behave in a Godly fashion. It was your responsibility to end the relationship with an explanation instead of dumping her cold turkey. Unless you want to go to jail, do what a woman would do. Take out a restraining order and keep your mouth shut.

Write: Ask Deanna! Email: askdeanna1@yahoo.com or 264 S. LaCienega Blvd. Suite 1283 Beverly Hills, CA 90211 Website: www.askdeanna.com.

Film explores voting chicanery

By Kam Williams
Sentinel-Voice

Up until about ten years ago or so, public opinion pollsters were capable of accurately forecasting the results of political elections in America.

But with the country's increasing reliance on unverifiable electronic balloting and the employment of shady shenanigans, the outcomes of the contests have become more and more unpredictable.

According to the exit polls, George Bush actually should have lost each of the last two presidential elections. For instance, in 2004, they had him trailing in 10 of 12 critical swing states, yet by evening's end he had somehow miraculously prevailed in seven of them.

So, is the voting process tainted or sacrosanct? That is the question addressed from every conceivable angle by "Stealing America Vote by Vote," a chilling exposé which paints a disgraceful picture of the nation as a land where power-hungry manipulators will do whatever it takes to ensure that their candidates prevail.

Directed by Dorothy Fadiman and narrated by Pe-

Review

(Continued from Page 6) and fortune.

Passman addresses virtually every question you can think of, structuring his invaluable advice in the logical order in which it will be needed by the neophyte. He suggests that you start your assault on the industry by assembling a team of advisors which ought to include a personal manager, a lawyer, a business manager and an agent.

The next section breaks down every aspect of a record deal, from advances to royalties to albums to videos to marketing to touring to merchandising. Next, he focuses on an often overlooked area, intellectual property, which is comprised of copyrighting, publishing and songwriting. And the text subsequently answers an array of ancillary inquiries about creative control, bootlegging, fees and financing.

If you know anyone dreaming of making it in the music world, I implore you to insist that they read this priceless treatise from cover to cover before they even think about entering into any agreements.

"Stealing America Vote by Vote" examines whether the American voting system is tainted.

ter Coyote, the film doesn't just focus on problems with computerized voting, but with a host of other tactics employed to subvert the desire of the electorate. Thus, we hear the anecdotal testimony of Black folks and college students forced to wait on line in Ohio for as long as 12 hours in order to cast their ballots, while the average wait for Whites in suburbia was about 18 minutes.

It is ironic that African-Americans ostensibly comprise the segment of society most frequently victimized by various vote suppression schemes, given their long, hard-fought civil rights struggle for enfranchisement. However the movie sheds light on a popular Republican trick employed in the last election involved sending registered letters to the homes of over a hundred thousand Black soldiers serving overseas in order to have their names removed from the voting lists when they were unable to sign the return receipt.

The film also furnishes evidence that equipment malfunctions have occurred in 42 states, with problems ranging from vote switching to frozen electronic screens to touch screens going blank to machine shortages to computer breakdowns to inaccurate tallies. This leaves one

(See Vote, Page 11)

STEVEN HORSFORD

SENATOR ★ DEMOCRATIC LEADER

A strong senator for all of us.

Vote Early –

Saturday, July 26th through Friday, August 8th

or Vote Primary Election Day –

Tuesday, August 12th

For a ride to the polls or more information, please call 642.4202

stevenhorsford.com

Paid for by Friends of Steven Horsford for Steven Horsford