

U.S. to boycott racism meeting

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Obama administration said Friday that the United States will boycott an upcoming U.N. conference on racism unless its final document is changed to drop all references to Israel and the defamation of religion.

At the same time, it said the U.S. would participate as an observer in meetings of the U.N. Human Rights Council, a body that was shunned by the Bush administration for anti-Israel statements and failing to act on abuses in Sudan and other states.

The racism conference is a follow-up to the contentious 2001 meeting in the South African city of Durban that was dominated by clashes over the Middle East and the legacy of slavery.

The U.S. and Israel walked out midway through that meeting over a draft resolution that singled out Israel for criticism and likened Zionism - the movement to establish and maintain a Jewish state - to racism.

Israel and Canada had already announced they would boycott the next World Conference Against Racism in Geneva from April 20-25, known as Durban II, but the Obama administration decided it wanted to assess the negotiations before making a decision on U.S. participation.

Last week, the State Department sent a team to Geneva to attend preparatory meetings for the conference but on Friday it said the closing statement under consideration mirrored the 2001 draft and was unacceptable.

"Sadly the document being negotiated has gone from bad to worse, and the current text of the draft outcome document is not salvageable," spokesman Robert Wood said in a statement.

"As a result, the United States will not engage in further negotiations on this text, nor will we participate in a conference based on this text," he said.

The United States will not take part in the conference unless its final statement does not single out any one country or conflict for criticism nor embrace the draft's stance on the condemnation or take up the issue of reparations for slavery, Wood said.

"We would be prepared to re-engage if a document that meets these criteria becomes the basis for deliberations," he said.

Israel, which was deeply concerned when the administration sent a delegation to the preparatory meeting, lobbied hard for the U.S. to stay away from the conference and pro-Israel groups hailed the decision.

"President Obama's decision not to send U.S. representation to the April event is the right thing to do and underscores America's unflinching commitment to combating intolerance and racism in all its forms and in all settings," the American Israel Public Affairs Committee said.

"It's a clear signal to the international community that this administration refuses to validate the hijacking of human rights by regimes led by Libya and Iran," said the Simon Wiesenthal Center, referring to countries that are supporting the draft statement.

U.S. officials said they are pressing European nations to boycott the conference unless there are revisions to the final statement. The Netherlands and France have already expressed concern about the contents.

Howard Berman, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, said he hoped the U.S. position "will galvanize like-minded countries and those who have been sitting on the sidelines to end this mindless march toward an outcome that serves none of the victims of racism, xenophobia and intolerance."

Although it announced the boycott of the Durban II conference, the State Department also said it would attend, as an observer, meetings of the U.N. Human Rights Council that the United States had previously stayed away from of criticism of Israel it said was one-sided.

Despite those concerns, Wood said the Obama administration believes that "it furthers our interests and will do more [to] advance human rights if we are part of the conversation and present at the councils proceedings."

"These times demand seriousness and candor, and we pledge to closely work with our partners in the international community to avoid politicization and to achieve our shared goals," he said.

The Obama administration had declined to speak during the council's review earlier this month of the human rights records of China, Russia and other countries the United States has previously criticized for abuses.

Obama intern program opens

Special to Sentinel-Voice

(NNPA) — President Barack Obama this week launched the White House Internship Program for his administration and announced that applications are currently being accepted for the summer of 2009.

Those selected to participate in the program will gain valuable job experience and an inside look at the life of White House staff while building leadership skills.

"This program will mentor and cultivate young leaders of today and tomorrow and I'm proud that they will have this opportunity to serve," said President Obama.

"I look forward to working with those that are selected to participate and I want to commend all who apply for their desire to help through public service to forge a brighter future for our country."

In addition to normal office duties, interns will supplement their learning experience by attending a weekly lecture series hosted by senior White House staff, help at White House social events, and volunteer in community service projects.

The 2009 Summer Internship program runs from May 22 to Aug. 14, and the submission deadline is March 22, 2009.

Those interested in applying to the White House Internship Program must be:

- U.S. Citizens.
- Eighteen years of age on or before the first day of the internship.
- Enrolled in a college or university (2-4 year institution) or must have graduated from college in the past two years.

Interns will be placed in a departmental office for their internship.

(See Internship, Page 11)

Center

(Continued from Page 1)

1960's as Native Americans, Latin Americans, African-Americans and others advocated for a place to honor the minority presence on campus. Today, ethnic minorities comprise 36 percent of UNLV's student body.

Keynote speaker Tony Gladney, vice president of corporate diversity of Harrah's Entertainment, praised the new center. "A college campus is microscopic view of what goes on in the broader community," said Gladney, a UNLV alumnus and former UNLV administrator. He recalls Vegas' sordid racial history. There was a time when Blacks were allowed to perform on the Strip, but not stay here.

During his time at UNLV, Gladney said a White roommate told him he got most of what he knew about Blacks from watching "Good Times," a popular late-70's show about a struggling family of five living the Chicago projects. He's able to laugh at the memory now. His pro-

Sentinel-Voice photo by Ramon Savoy

Tony Gladney, vice president for national diversity relations for Harrah's Entertainment, the world's largest casino concern, presented $10,000 to UNLV's multicultural center. fessors taught him "you cease to exist when you stop learning. All the people we meet count."

"The UNLV Multicultural Center is also important to the business community," he said, noting that Las Vegas is a top international tourist destination. "It will be a beacon and we are glad it exist," added Gladney, who presented a $10,000 check to the center from Harrah's Entertainment.

"We believe in making sure we strengthen the areas in the communities in which we operate."

The UNLV Multicultural Center-Centro Multicultural accepts donations of money, services and products such as used or new computers and books for the library. Those interested in more donating to the center or seeking more information about the center can call Jose Melendrez at 702-895-5604.

CityCenter is offering talented and passionate individuals the unique opportunity to showcase their dedication to exceptional customer service. Find yourself in the center of the newest and most exciting development by MGM MIRAGE™, working and learning alongside the most recognized and respected names in the hospitality industry.

Redefine
Las Vegas
and your career.

At CityCenter, let your talent take you as far as you want it to go. You'll work in a fun and welcoming work environment with a diverse team equally as dedicated as you. Join us and bring your exceptional talent to help us create the most significant hospitality experience in the world.

For more information, or to apply, visit:
CityCenterCareers.com

Equal Opportunity Employer.